Property Description

Human beings depend on the balance of ecosystems to survive, and Costa Rica plays a vital role in global ecological protection. Although it covers only 51,000 square kilometers, the country is home to more than 500,000 species, protects 26% of its territory, and represents about 6% of the world's biodiversity. This richness is due to its location between the Caribbean and Pacific oceans, serving as a biological bridge between North and South America. For decades, conservation has been a pillar of sustainable development in Costa Rica. Thirty-five years ago, one family established a conservation project founded on three pillars: Conservation, Research, and Education. The Reserve is a rainforest and cloud forest sanctuary located along Costa Rica's Continental Divide, at elevations between 1,500 and 2,000 meters. It forms a biological corridor between Poás Volcano National Park and Juan Castro Blanco Aquatic National Park and is conveniently located near San José and the international airport.
